This reaction, known as glycosylation, has been widely used in the synthesis of biologically active compounds. For example, glycosylation can be used to prepare oligosaccharides that contain naturally occurring or modified saccharide moieties. This is illustrated by the following example of a bioactive compound, glycopeptides. Glycopeptides have been reported to have anti-bacterial activity against a number of gram-positive bacteria, including penicillin-resistant strains (see, e.g., Pederson, Glycoconjugate J., 9: 167-182, (1992)). Glycopeptides also have been reported to have immunosuppressive activity (see, e.g., U.S. Pat. No. 5,352,864, incorporated herein by reference). Glycopeptides also have been reported to have anti-inflammatory activity (see, e.g., U.S. Pat. No. 5,352,864). To be clinically useful, glyc ca3bfb1094
