Macrophages contain numerous mechanisms for degrading connective tissue. Several lines of evidence indicate that proteolysis by these cells is not solely due to the production of hydrolytic enzymes, but may also be due to the action of collagenases, which cleave the triple helical domain of interstitial collagens. Recent advances in the purification and characterization of macrophage collagenases in monocytes, polymorphonuclear leukocytes and alveolar macrophages are discussed. It is suggested that in these cells there is a preferential collagenolytic activity (quantitated by in-gel degradation and by the release of collagen-derived peptides into the culture medium) and an anti-collagenase activity (a protective activity against collagenase-induced degradation of the extracellular matrix) in monocytes and polymorphonuclear leukocytes, whereas alveolar macrophages have a specific pro-collagenolytic capacity and no detectable anti-collagenase activity. One Two Three One Two Three is a 2012 Scottish drama film written and directed by Gregory Burke. The film premiered in the Special Presentations programme at the 2012 Edinburgh International Film Festival and was first released in the US, on 19 May 2013. Plot John Craig lives in Northampton, England with his wife Annie, their young daughter, Tabitha and his parents, although as a young man, he was caught up in the urban riots and stolen his uncle's house in Manchester. A few years later, John is working as a lab technician, married with three children, when he comes into conflict with two of his colleagues. When the two quarrel, they become caught in the crossfire of two gangs, ending with a dead police officer. Fearing reprisals, John is forced to flee the area. His family had moved out of Northampton for safety. His wife and children have since returned to Manchester, but the job John has found is not what he expected; too low paid, too small a flat, his new boss is a man 3da54e8ca3
