But they don't point in the right direction. Although the world is rapidly approaching a point at which atmospheric concentrations of carbon dioxide, and hence global temperatures, will pass a safe threshold (see Carbon Brief graphic below), policymakers are still struggling to agree on how to proceed. A key disagreement centres on the potential consequences of failing to make substantial reductions in carbon dioxide emissions. In an accompanying letter, environmental economist Stefan Rahmstorf, who was the first author on the leaked draft plan released in January, says that the present plan is premature because carbon dioxide levels are still below projected limits. Rahmstorf also points to a "large unexplained gap" between the 2°C and the 1.5°C reference cases used in the draft plan. However, some people have argued that the consequences of warming are already being felt as carbon dioxide concentrations rise close to their expected safe limit, making the draft plan's reference case of 1.5°C too high. Dotearth and methane Under the most likely scenario, warming is likely to exceed 1.5°C by the end of the century, causing a chain reaction of feedbacks that will contribute to further temperature increases. Two feedbacks play a major role in this process. One is "runaway climate change", which arises from a positive feedback loop involving water vapour and global warming. The other involves land ice loss that triggers greater temperature increases, which triggers more ice loss. However, the draft plan does not reflect these potential additional warming effects, which scientists have predicted would occur, so it

Despite the morbidity and cost of colorectal cancer, a program of screening for this common disease is still in its infancy. More than 90 published controlled trials of screening for colorectal cancer have been conducted since the 1960s. Despite this, and the fact that the differential benefit of screening has not been established, public f30f4ceada
