Grip on his hawk: Combat Racing, often abbreviated as Grip, is a racing video game developed by Canadian studio Caged Element and published by Wired Productions for the .NET Compact Framework. Even though the game mechanics and technology are mostly created with similar devices in mind (like Twitch), every player will find something in the game that will inspire him or his audience. As for the graphic and sound design, it has its own characteristics. For example, the video setting in the game allows the player to rotate the race on frame and see how interesting each next race participant will be. In addition, the player can set up one of 6 virtual remote control modes depending on the style of the race, thereby adjusting the visualization from spectacular to realistic and therefore more realistic gameplay. Other features are action games that include racing and platforming. Each of the locations is completely different and has its own characteristics, such as pits, detours and return points. You will be able to meet players with different skills, abilities and temperaments, and in each race the game will give bonuses, depending on how successfully you complete the task, but do not forget: one of them may come to the finish line with less health, or will be forced to give up after 15 laps, and maybe even after a few laps. While the game requires a lot of time and difficult tracks to complete, it is well suited for players of all ages and genders. The game's plot is classic for racing games and involves the player's car colliding with other cars that are also trying to win.
