Animal studies and epidemiological evidence have found that exposure to DBCP can cause congenital defects such as cleft palate and hypospadias in male offspring; defects involving reproductive development are of particular concern because many women and men in the U.S. are exposed to DBCP, either through direct application of the compound or through consumption of food that was treated with the compound during its growth. The question, then, is whether DBCP may be causing these defects in humans. DBCP has been used as a fumigant to kill insects, and one consequence of that usage is that DBCP is readily absorbed by soil microorganisms that live in the soil. Because most crops are grown in soil, it is a reasonable assumption that people can be exposed to DBCP through its consumption. In fact, both the general public and a number of industries are exposed to DBCP, either because it is used as a fumigant or as an active ingredient in pesticides. The CDC's alarm about DBCP arose from its finding that people who were exposed to DBCP through these fumigants and pesticides had a significantly higher risk of birth defects, as measured by their offspring's congenital heart defects. The purpose of this study is to assess the possible genetic basis for the observed association. The
