(Hebrew Wikipedia) Category:Hebrew BibleSexual education and HIV/AIDS in young adults.
We conducted three surveys to estimate the prevalence of sexual behavior in young adults in northwest metropolitan Washington, D.C. and Phoenix, and to assess the experience of receiving information about sex in those cities. In the survey of 1,173 students at the University of Arizona, we found that 34.5% of females and 22.0% of males received formal sex education (for comparison with other studies, see "Methods"). Unreliable data from other studies make it impossible to directly compare the proportion of students receiving formal sex education. However, only 6.3% of students reported that sex education was the most important subject they learned in school; 5% reported that learning about abuse and violence was the most important subject, and 5.3% reported that learning about drugs was the most important.
Only 11% of students reported that their parents had discussed sex with them, and only 7% of those students reported having discussed it with teachers or school counselors. About one third of the students were not sure if their teacher or school counselor had discussed sex education.
When we compared those students whose parents had discussed sex with them with those whose parents had not, we found that students whose parents had discussed sex tended to have more sexual partners, be more confident about sex, and have fewer fears about sex. We also found that 45% of the students in the survey had not had a discussion about sex with their parents. These findings suggest that many parents are failing to discuss sex with their children, teachers are not discussing sex education in a way that prepares students to learn from it, and many students' sex education experiences are discouraging and many more benefits! Find us
