Covariates in xerostomia prediction and management: a multivariable logistic regression analysis. Covariate analysis examines patient factors to determine the relationship between them and the target endpoint of interest. Xerostomia is a prevalent symptom among patients with multiple system atrophy (MSA), possibly related to the demyelinating nature of this disease. The objective of this study was to identify the major covariates that are predictive of xerostomia in MSA. Data from the North Central and Southern California MSA patient study were analyzed. Inclusion criteria were patients at least 19 years old, with a Clinical Dementia Rating of 0, able to understand the study, and available saliva. All subjects underwent standardized end-of-day (bedside) and morning and evening diaries. A logistic regression model was used to identify the major covariates that are predictive of xerostomia in MSA patients. Hypoglossal nerve function was found to be the only covariate that explained a significant percentage of the variance in xerostomia ( $R^2 = 0.293$ ,  $p = 0.0001$ ). The three-way interactions, age, hypoglossal nerve function, and gender, were found to be non-significant. Patients with more severe hypoglossal nerve palsy tended to have more severe xerostomia, possibly as a reflection of their difficulty swallowing. As hypoglossal nerve palsy becomes more severe, patients' xerostomia also tends to increase. Xerostomia can be predicted by the degree of hypoglossal nerve palsy. This finding lends support to the observed significant increase in dysphagia in MSA patients that was also previously reported. {"name": "svelte-
