What's New in the Photoshop 2021 (Version 22.3.1)?

FAIRFAX, VA, October 2, 2013: In Good Accounting News this week, a new paper from The Bureau of Economic Analysis (BEA), the official bean counters of the United States economy, shows that in 2013, the US economy actually experienced a modest positive economic growth, at 1.7 percent. This represents the second consecutive year of growth and the largest annual increase in growth since 2005. The growth rate is well below the rate of growth we've seen in much of the world over the past several years, and nearly twice the rate of growth we experienced back in 2011, which was the second worst year since 1929. However, the bottom line is that the US is growing again, with substantial gains in GDP and consumer confidence. As BEA makes clear, the economy had a lot of work to do in the first quarter of 2013 and is still recovering from the final months of recession. The lion's share of the GDP growth over the past year has been the result of increased consumer spending, although the supply side of the economy also improved. Oil production and exports are up, and the labor force has regained some of the jobs lost during the recession. While the overall economy is expanding, the recovery is slow. Many jobs continue to be created, but real median household income has increased little, despite the fact that most workers are experiencing their longest economic expansion since the Great Depression. There's something missing from this picture; we have not seen the kind of broad consumer inflation that would, over time, boost the average American's standard of living. Until we see some substantial economic growth in consumer spending, which has fallen by a record amount over the past year, it's difficult to understand what the Federal Reserve could do, other than to tinker with the buying power of our dollars. Monetary policy makes some sense. We don't need a new money supply; we need to get money where it's needed, to consumers, who have dropped the money in their checking accounts by $61 billion over the past year. They need the additional spending power that the Federal Reserve is shoveling into their pockets. Finally, we are seeing early signs that workers are starting to spend, and incomes are increasing. According to data from the Census Bureau, personal income for the third quarter of 2013 was 4.1 percent higher than for the second quarter of 2013. If the recovery from the Great Recession holds,
