Screenshot Your PC with VB Doodle (Windows) | Techwalla Wnt Signaling and the Development of Drosophila Heart. The endoderm is an essential tissue in heart development that forms the base of all heart tubes, the precursors of which are known as the cardiac primordia. The zebrafish endoderm is located on the ventral side of the embryo and is important for specification of cardiomyocytes and the formation of a complete peristaltic heart. Although many regulatory genes required for proper cardiac specification have been identified, the endoderm has also been identified as an important regulator of these genes, and there is still much to be learned about the roles of the endoderm in this process. The Drosophila heart and its regulation are useful for study of cardiac development, and the Drosophila endoderm serves as a valuable model to study endoderm function. Here, we review the roles of Wnt signaling during Drosophila heart development, discuss the contributions of Drosophila endoderm to the heart, and summarize the literature related to the possible role of the endoderm in cardiomyocyte specification. [The efficacy of antibiotic therapy in chronic obstructive bronchitis in children]. The results of examination of 42 patients with chronic bronchitis (CB) by x-ray and spirometry and of antibacterial therapy with amoxicillin (AM), erythromycin (E) and cephaloridine (C) in 4-7-fold daily doses for 15 days are presented. In the period of observations, CB was active in 27% of the cases, insufficiently active in 60% and in 9% there was no response to therapy. Relapses of CB and exacerbations were observed in 68.6%, in 35.7% exacerbations were primary, whereas in 2.8% exacerbations appeared for the first time. AM demonstrated good clinical efficacy in all the patients, while in two patients CB exacerbations developed in the course of therapy; the efficacy of C was inferior to that of AM and E. A typical CCD (Charge Coupled Device) image sensor includes a large array of photosensitive sites, or photo-sites, arranged in rows and columns, and a circuit which provides a potential to each photo-site, typically a ramp voltage, that varies between a ground potential and a higher potential, for example, a reference potential, typically the positive supply. The camera is constructed by connecting the output of the CCD in parallel to a standard video processing circuit which includes a synchronous shift register and a sample and hold circuit. When a scene is illuminated, the image of the scene is stored in the CCD by changing the potential of the ramp so that photo-sites are either charged or discharged to the positive supply voltage. After the image has been stored, the CCD
