Bush on Jan. 4, 2002, but its existence was not revealed until a New York Times article was published on Sept. 6, 2006. The author of the article was Janet Reitman, a Pulitzer Prize-winning reporter for The Times. The agreement, which was authorized by a provision of the Anti-Terrorism Act of 2001, was supported by the author herself: "The reality is that we have now put counterterrorism programs out of the courts. They no longer go before the judge and say "Please, this is the president's war," and let's take a look at it in open court. Instead, it is now done, I think, successfully, in secret. We have done that; we have taken it out of court. So that is a victory." Reitman's statement implies that the judge would have had some legal recourse if she had been made aware of the secret wiretap order. This is incorrect. Even if the wiretap order had been signed in open court, the judge would still not have been able to enforce it. When a warrant is presented to a judge, the judge either approves it or not. If the warrant is approved, the police can go ahead and tap a phone; if the warrant is denied, the police are told to stop the tap. The question presented to the judge is simply whether there is sufficient evidence
