

There is a new tool/script that includes this HWID activation and a previous KMS activation (such as KMSPico) that can be used to activate both Windows and .NET My understanding is that once Windows (and possibly .NET) is activated, KMS should activate Windows again for every reboot. However, why does Windows need KMS to reboot? I know windows can be updated with KMS or updates etc but why does it have to activate KMS again after every update Generally, Windows will never work with another activation unless you do something like this (or probably something else)
