Superficial bladder cancer is a common malignancy but presents a vexing clinical challenge, particularly in patients with a life expectancy that will be exceeded by the disease. Major complications in the form of systemic treatment-related toxicities and the high rate of tumor recurrences despite partial response to intravesical therapy are confounding factors that drive controversy concerning the optimal management of this disease. This article reviews the available literature on the management of superficial bladder cancer and discusses the implications of selected studies for clinical practice. Although there is still some controversy about the optimal regimen for maintenance therapy, it is clear that in conjunction with complete transurethral resection, instillation of a potent agent is necessary. Recent studies suggest that long-term maintenance therapy with a combination of epirubicin and Bacillus Calmette-Guerin produces better long-term control than bacillus Calmette-Guerin alone. This analysis also suggests that while the surgical margin at cystectomy does not affect the prognosis of T1G3 bladder cancer, the surgical margin may be a useful tool to predict the response to intravesical therapy. Despite its challenges, intravesical therapy remains the mainstay in the long-term management of superficial bladder cancer.1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a method of producing stably electrophotographic images that can suitably be used for high-speed copiers or duplicators. 2. Description of the Related Art In this specification and in the appended claims, the term "electrophotographic" is used not only for the process of dry development on a photoconductor, but also for the process of development with a wet developer containing a toner. As a technique for directly forming a visible image on a photoconductive insulating layer of an electrophotographic photosensitive member, there is known a system in which light-sensitive members made of organic materials (organic electrophotographic
