Here's what to look out for: Loading an image on your monitor Since your monitor displays all photos in 8-bit color (256 colors), you must have Photoshop open before you load an image. If you don't, Photoshop will display only 256 color but the image will not be visible. To load an image open Photoshop, click File > Open and navigate to the image you want. Multiple images Some files can only be viewed in Photoshop as a whole or as multiple images. To do this, first Open the image and lock it, that is the drag the mouse to lock the image so you don't accidentally touch any pixels. Now, click File > Photoshop > Unwrap. Tone Mapping Some images may have a gray (colorless) tone. The black mask created using the Masking tool can only mask out areas of an image, it can't remove the gray tone from an image. After you mask out the gray tone, try using the Dodge and Burn tools. Screenwriting Being a nonfiction author is quite different from fiction writing. Since you often need to write a scene or plot, make sure that you're comfortable with the terminology used for screenwriting. Some terms will help you with a better understanding of the ways you write nonfiction: Microplot: a plot that takes the form of a series of smaller (dramatic) plots. In other words, the plot is the same, but the way it is presented is different. Macroplot: it is a more generalized, more complex, plot than the microplot. It has greater scope, but the details are left for the writer to fill in. Chapters: nonfiction chapters are like chapters in a fictional book, with the difference that the information is technical and is more often blended into the text to enhance the flow. Story arc: nonfiction does not usually have an arc like fiction. The author usually handles the story in a continuous flow, but sometimes the reader may feel the need to read more about a topic to understand something better. NARRATION: a sequence of words to tell a story. The words are called NARRATION because they don't change the story, but they connect it. INTERLUDE: something in the middle of a story, a pause, that could interrupt or cut the flow. It is called
