Plot summary The plot involves a group of German spies who have infiltrated the UK by way of Ireland; their leader, Dr. Siegfried Willoughby, is a medical officer in the army, and they have sought cover at a dower house on the Yorkshire Moors. Meanwhile, their plans to assassinate Admiral Darlan, the French war minister, were foiled by their own associates and they seek refuge on board a German merchant ship in Belfast. The ship is intercepted by the British and the Germans are captured, along with a passage to America aboard another ship. The novel is told through the eyes of a private detective, Arthur Beesley, in two time periods: the period of the 1930s civil war in Spain and the period of the Second World War. Before he is able to bring the group to justice, however, they are intercepted and one of their colleagues dies and, in the end, three of the Germans escape to Spanish soil, where they are finally arrested. Characters Siegfried Willoughby An army surgeon in the German army, he is tasked with the assassination of Admiral Darlan. Dr. Arndt A member of Willoughby's group of German spies who first arrives in Ireland. Dr. Redfern Member of the group who's elected as the captain of the group when they arrive in London after their failed attempt to assassinate Darlan. Major Smollett Is arrested and confesses to being a British agent. Mister Farnsworth The son of the owner of the dower house where they are hiding out. John Marriott A member of the group who is traveling as Dr. Dickson. But you may never need the twenty-four-lens method of today's prime lenses, which all have a focal length equivalent to about 200 millimeters. Instead, a new approach called "extreme" photography may be the way to the wide-field future. This technique captures an image of a subject with near-infrared light, then converts it to visible light using a separate special lens that uses ultrathin infrared-blocking filter. The result is an image with much better resolution than typical visible-light camera. The prototype camera, which is a collaboration of researchers at Arizona State University, the University of Southern California and Concordia University, was able to capture an image of a typical golf-course scene with high resolution and contrast. "The primary purpose of this project was to find a way to make an infrared camera that can be used in the day time and maybe even produce high-resolution images of outdoor scenes," says Jiaye Chen, professor of optics and director of the Spatial Vision and Image Processing Laboratory at Arizona State University. "It's this potential for capturing a better image of the outdoors in the day that has us excited," he says. Infrared wavelengths have many uses. For example, they are used in night-vision devices. But they also offer greater depth of field than visible light: a subject that's in the scene but off-center will only have a narrow, blurry halo around it when the shot is taken in infrared light. The problem with infrared photography is that the filters that block infrared light tend to fog up over time, and they block too much visible light to make a useful camera. In this prototype, the filter is thinner than human hair and its thickness is controlled by two parallel narrow strips of metal. Chen and his
