Prophylactic use of antibiotic premedication in elective surgery: a meta-analysis. Studies investigating the effectiveness of preoperative antibiotic prophylaxis were reviewed. A meta-analysis of randomized, controlled clinical trials showed that prophylactic use of antibiotics reduces the incidence of surgical wound infection. However, there was no beneficial effect of preoperative antibiotic prophylaxis in terms of preventing postoperative infection, sepsis, or death. In conclusion, preoperative antibiotics in the prevention of surgical wound infection are suggested, and they may be used before elective procedures.Parallelism in tumor growth and microvessel density in lung cancer. Tumor growth and angiogenesis are closely related in lung cancer. However, their relationship with each other has not been clearly shown. To address this issue, the relationships of tumor growth and microvessel density (MVD) with each other were analyzed and the influence of tumor growth on MVD was evaluated. A total of 80 cases of surgically resected lung cancer were investigated. MVD, and the numbers of cancer cells and fibroblasts in the invasive fronts of the tumors were examined by immunohistochemical analysis. When the MVD was classified into low and high MVD groups, no differences in the numbers of cancer cells in the invasive fronts were seen between them (low MVD group, 15.0 +/- 11.5/mm<sup>2</sup>; high MVD group, 15.3 +/- 12.8/mm<sup>2</sup>). In addition, no differences in the numbers of cancer cells in the central regions of the tumors were seen (low MVD group, 22.9 +/- 19.3/mm<sup>2</sup>; high MVD group, 26.3 +/- 23.2/mm<sup>2</sup>). On the other hand, significantly more fibroblasts were seen in the invasive fronts than in the central regions of the tumors (low MVD group, 24.4 +/- 20.2/mm<sup>2</sup>; high MVD group, 44.3 +/- 21.7/mm<sup>2</sup>). Furthermore, significantly more fibroblasts were seen in the tumors with lower numbers of cancer cells in the invasive fronts (p
