The rise of the MOOC is one of the world's most disruptive innovations for education. In a global context it is helping to establish a new model for learning across the world. We can confidently expect more innovations and more disruptions in the future. In this report you will see the effects of this transformation in the local context and our reactions. The MOOC revolution Worldwide MOOCs are being developed and have been developed since 2009 with particular focus on low-cost free courses for massive numbers of participants. The MOOC is being developed by the new users and for the new users who are online. The number of students who take part in MOOCs exceeds a thousand millions, with countries like India leading the way. The MOOC is also being used by universities, especially those in developing countries, to test their pedagogy, but also to teach their students. MOOCs are being developed by government ministries to provide a pathway to employment for millions of people. MOOCs are being developed for learning as well as for socializing. The number of people who take part in MOOCs is growing. But, the use of MOOCs in a traditional setting is still relatively small. In fact, in developed countries, MOOCs attract very few participants. The number of students taking MOOCs is growing and many universities are becoming MOOC providers, especially in the United States. It is important to note that most MOOCs are related to degree programmes, although this will change in the future. The use of MOOCs is growing. Most users of MOOCs are in higher education institutions, though interest is also coming from the public sector in the United States (USA). However, according to the OECD report, courses in MOOCs tend to be less successful than courses in local classrooms. The traditional model of higher education is under pressure. MOOCs are disrupting traditional higher education in developed countries. The MOOC is changing the

I've been around the block in the work/life balance department a few times. Last summer I had a little more free time than I'd intended to have. I took on a new-to-me job that involved more hours a day and less hours of sleep. It was rewarding and made me feel appreciated for the extra hours I put in, but I realized it was only a matter of time before I reached an impasse. I felt too stretched and used and, most of all, a little overwhelmed by the responsibilities of full-time motherhood. I'm now in a new season of work, and though I love my job, I feel like I've hit a speed bump. I have some new responsibilities, but a limited amount of time to do them. And I'm feeling a little stretched and used and a little overwhelmed by all of them. How do you negotiate that? I often look to less fortunate women to find their paths. Whether it's women who are raising families or running their own businesses, I think those women teach me a lot about being on my own. I read about them and chat with them via the Happily Anywhere Yahoo group, and I know they're out there. So instead of making a decision like you did, I'm going to commit to my own best self-care and to asking for help in an appropriate way. If that means asking my husband to make coffee for me or requesting some of the baby's clothes, so be it. I like to think of my new work situation as an opportunity to grow as a person and a mother and a woman. We all have to balance it out and find our own way. I've really been glad that my husband has been willing to stay home with the baby (unless I'm sleeping). And if you're lucky, your husband might be willing to do some of the "housework" for you. It really makes a difference to be able to have a man who wants to be home with the kids. A few months ago, when I was working a full-time job and writing my book, I found myself in the same struggle. I totally understand. I had free time (something I don't have as much right now), so I decided to work on 648931e174
