Programs Flawless MultiCam is a high-end webcam solution. The frequently used x-ray measuring device for medical purposes comprises several different stations. The patient is first placed on the x-ray scanning device (an x-ray source or a x-ray table), and he is thereupon exposed in the x-ray scanning device to radiation. Then the radiation is examined in the x-ray system apparatus in which the x-ray film is exposed in the x-ray system apparatus to the radiation coming from the scanning device. For this purpose, the x-ray film is located in the x-ray system apparatus in front of a flat-screen television receiver. The x-ray film moves with a fan scanner between the x-ray film and the television screen through a path which extends in the direction of the movement of the x-ray film. The x-ray film is placed onto the x-ray receiver of a camshaft which is driven in synchrony with the movement of the x-ray film. In order to synchronize the x-ray film with the x-ray system apparatus, the x-ray system apparatus is provided with a synchronization generator which is in the form of a timing card. The synchronization generator is connected by way of a cable to the camshaft. The synchronization generator causes the camshaft to rotate in synchrony with the movement of the x-ray film. This is achieved by the synchronization generator being set into operation by the shutter of the x-ray system apparatus when the patient is being exposed to the radiation. In the German OS No. 29 33 679, a device for the synchronization of a x-ray film and a x-ray system apparatus is shown, in which the synchronization generator is provided in the form of a motor-driven timer and the camshaft is directly connected to the timer. The camshaft is moved at a constant velocity, thus providing for a constant speed between the x-ray film and the synchronization generator. It is true that the device shown in the cited German OS No. 29
