Windows have long served as a platform for display applications. For example, monitors, televisions, and other electronic displays that use cathode ray tube displays are widely used. However, these displays have long display modes that make it difficult to handle video signals from more advanced sources. These modes include, for example, National Television Standards Committee (NTSC), Phase Alternating Line (PAL) and Digital Video Interface (DVI). As these display modes evolve, it becomes more desirable to display data in these modes on larger monitors and displays. For example, in the Digital Video Interface format, data is stored in three streams called Component Y, Cr and Cb (displayed as C, Y and B, respectively, for brevity), and in the Component Y and Cb channels, a larger amount of data is stored per line than is stored in the Cr channel. As a result, in these systems, three signals are required to represent a single image or frame of video. In contrast, in the NTSC/PAL/DVI system, only a single signal is required per line, and in fact, video data may be stored as a single signal that can be displayed on televisions and computers. However, such televisions and computers are not generally capable of receiving the raw stream of data as is done in these display modes (e.g., in NTSC/PAL). It is possible to convert each of these three signals (Y, Cr and Cb) to a single stream of data, but it is difficult to convert the Y-Chroma signals, since the chrominance information is interpreted differently in the two systems. Further, most
