A message appears on Alexa's digital screen. She turns on the audio device to listen. The machine is talking to her. It looks remarkably similar to the instructions on the instructions at your local high-street bank or auto shop: "Load £25", "Withdraw £25", "balance", "Please wait". The reality television star, whose real name is not known, is flanked by her two children as she addresses the nation on live television via a pre-recorded segment titled "Alexa, what is the EU?". The interview marks the election campaign debut of her Make Britain Great Again Twitter campaign, a unique twist on the social media spectacle that has become a feature of US presidential campaigns. Instead of helping amplify the views of the Democratic and Republican candidates, the online constituency of the controversial reality TV star is free to tweet opinions and offer advice, as if she were a user of her website, the American version of Google. But Alexa doesn't have a problem acknowledging her bias. "I believe that the EU is best for the United Kingdom," she says. "
