"The developers at Elden Ring take one of the most popular RPG series of all time and apply their own unique touch to the table. I am excited that this game will be coming my way in the near future. You are looking at a great game for any fan of any RPG." - ArieUkun1, Ultima Universe fanQ: How to know when this query (which is like an INSERT, but doesn't write) has completed There is an issue where an INSERT query is being run and not being committed, and then there is an UPDATE query running after that, trying to change all the rows in the table. There is no command to commit something to a table. As this isn't a single transaction, I cannot call APPLY TRANSACTION. I can call APPLY SERIALIZABLE, but that will "commit" every single row in the table in one giant batch. As such, I don't want any changes made to the table in any INSERT/UPDATE/DELETE queries running after the INSERT/UPDATE query. The question is, how do I see when an INSERT query has completed, but not committed? The only way I can think of doing this is to Do the INSERT query. Look up the table, and see if it's in a state that I consider to be good. Compare the table's state to what it was before. Do the UPDATE query. Compare the table's state to what it was before. If the table's state was good before (i.e. it was in a consistent, good state), then the table is in a good state and everything is good. Otherwise, something bad happened and I need to undo it. The issue is that the table's state is hard to judge. If it's in an inconsistent state, it is hard to tell if it's OK. If it was in a consistent state, it's not consistent until the next commit. I need to know if the state was at a point before the commit. A: Not sure if this helps, but I think there is no need to manually poll the table. Just call session.Merge(): using (var session = DbContext.OpenSession()) { var transaction = session.BeginTransaction(); var
