Brannon Spanos, a 40-year-old Minnesota resident, was arrested last week for “felony stalking.” Since Spanos was a teenager, he’s been charged repeatedly with domestic abuse and felony stalking. Apparently, his attacks only stopped after he was injured in a car crash. Police received a 911 call about shots fired around 7:30 a.m. on Saturday, Dec. 22, 2009. When police arrived at the scene, they found Spanos asleep in a car with a bullet hole in his side. Spanos told police, “I heard a click of the rifle being aimed in my direction so I fired ... the war’s over.” When people hear the words “domestic abuse,” they typically associate these terms with women. A recent study found that most people — 97 percent — think that a husband has the right to use violence against his wife and children. They’re wrong. In the United States, a husband has the very same right to defend his family against violence that a wife has to defend herself. Some states explicitly permit husbands to use deadly force to protect their families. California, for example, writes that “in defense of either spouse, the other spouse, or any other person, the law does not preclude the use of deadly force.” The gender of the abuser is irrelevant to the seriousness of the crime of domestic violence. The use of force by one husband against his wife isn’t more or less justified than the use of force by a wife against her husband. There

In this case it will return 4. A: You can use the Collections.max() method with a collector (like a Comparator); Collections.max(a, Collections.reverseComparator(new Comparator() { @Override public int compare(Integer a, Integer b) { return b.compareTo(a); } })); You can find more details about collectors in this excellent article. A: The Collections.max() method takes a Collector that can aggregate the elements into a single value. It's an Iterable and any subclass of the iterator in the class that returns the elements of the sequence. Here's an example: // get a.iterator(), create a CountingIterator. // adds some elements, so the list now contains the numbers 1..5 final List a = Arrays.asList(1, 2, 3, 4, 5); final CountingIterator countingIterator = new CountingIterator(a.iterator()); // set our collector in case we want to aggregate the elements final Collector collector = new Collector() { @Override public Integer collect(Iterator t) {
