In an age when it seems every other franchise is trying to emulate the Real Madrid and Barcelona football clubs, FIFA is defying the digital revolution. Yes, that's right: FIFA, you geeks. You want to give birth to some sense of immortality by using real-life players data and your software. Data that's recorded and analysed 24 hours a day by people from your very own lab. Since the release of the World Cup-winning game, players, coaches and analysts have used video material to make many case for the benefits of 'player data' in football. What's more, the development of automated match analysis is making good use of players' tendencies, strengths and weaknesses. The Premier League has been particularly keen to offer data analysis to coaches since the introduction of technology in football matches and now the top division is committed to offering tools for clubs and coaches. Most clubs have serious interest in data analysis, but the technology is still expensive, and like similar systems in sport, clubs must rely on themselves to invest in the necessary education and facilities. Real Madrid is the world's most valuable football club, with an estimated annual revenue of over €495 million. But the staff at the club don't seem particularly confident in their data, with only a few analytics experts, of limited experience, a handful of computers and a few flashy charts. And, as it happens, that is where the club's brain trust is located. Real Madrid chief executive, José Ángel Sánchez Gil, said: "We are a club like any other club, made up of people who love football. The decision to hire an outsider would seem strange but that is the only way we work." The most recent data, developed by Barcelona's head of analysis, Joaquim Raimundo, suggests the new signing, Neymar Jr, is more effective when playing without the ball. To illustrate, here is the position of Barcelona's possession play for Neymar vs Messi in the 5-1 friendly win over Paris-Saint Germain: In the above illustration, it is clear that Barcelona create most of their play without the ball, passing to Messi who then creates plays to start passing and build-up play. Neymar, on the other hand, mostly plays with the ball in his feet with less direct dribbling and dribbling
