Field of the Invention This invention relates to a method of transmitting/receiving data through a PCM (Pulse Code Modulation) communications link. 2. Description of the Related Art A conventional communications link connecting a pair of electronic data devices transmits data at a predetermined bit rate in an ideal condition. For the purpose of facilitating the understanding of the background of the present invention, a description will first be made of the conventional method of transmitting/receiving data through a PCM communications link. As illustrated in FIG. 1, data 1 to be transmitted is converted into corresponding PCM data 2 by a communications control unit, such as a modem, contained in a transmitting-side electronic data device. The corresponding PCM data 2 includes the 8-bit data comprised of 8 bits 0-7, and the data containing no information, as for 8 bits 8-15, is referred to as the parity data. The parity data is added to the front of the corresponding PCM data 2, which is then transmitted over a communications line 3 in the form of a PCM communications waveform. The PCM data 2 thus transmitted over the communications line 3 is received by a receiving-side electronic data device with the communications control unit, such as a modem, being contained therein. The communications control unit, such as the modem, decodes the PCM data 2 received and then reconverts it into 8-bit data, that is, the data comprised of 8 bits 0-7. Thereafter, this 8-bit data is converted into the corresponding information 1. By way of example, assume that the data is transmitted/received at a data transmission rate of 1.544 Mbps. In this instance, as illustrated in FIG. 2, when the PCM data 2 corresponding to a 16-bit word is transmitted over the communications line 3, the PCM data 2
