The review is based on recent and classical findings on the components of the secretory apparatus of central neurons. The internal organelles involved in the exocytotic process are described as well as their morphological and physiological functional relationship. The evidence is advanced to indicate that endocytosis plays an important role in the regulation of transmitter release. However, there is now strong evidence that the process is not only a "passive mechanism for clearing the membrane but is an important component of a cellular signalling process which may provide an efficient route for the transmission of information within the nervous system.
