Packages1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a method and apparatus for maintaining temperature control with simultaneous good flame control. 2. Description of the Prior Art Where kerosene is used as a fuel for an appliance, such as a barbecue grill, it is known that it is desirable to heat the fuel to a steady high temperature for a prolonged period of time. This permits the fuel to be burned at the required temperature for the duration of the heating procedure. In theory, the procedure is also desirable for a simple reason--on the average, kerosene is less expensive than oil. In practice, there are a number of obstacles to be overcome, the foremost being the difficulty of having control over the temperature of the fuel. This is a problem that is of particular importance in the case of kerosene, which has a tendency to vaporize, forming a liquid state which is dense and runs, eventually covering the fuel and extinguishing the flame. A flame is not necessarily necessary for the heating process, for the purpose of the device described can be to heat the substance to a slightly higher temperature than it would normally attain without some type of heat source. Known devices for maintaining the temperature of a substance suffer

I'm trying to make a game and need to loop my object. var ball = Object({ x: 0, y: 0, init: function() { this.ball = { x: 0, y: 0 } } draw: function() { } }); Can I do something like this: for (var ball in ball.ball) { ball.draw() } Thanks A: You can try this function draw(){ for (var i = 0; i Q: Check if object has a pointer-to-object method I want to check whether an object has a pointer-to-object method. I am not sure what the best way is to do this, I want to catch all the cases that a method is defined as a pointer-to-object method. I want to avoid compiler warnings, so, please, don't suggest to use void* or any other hack. EDIT: My question is what the best way to do this is in c++11 or c++14 A: Try this: #include <template void check(T* obj) { constexpr bool has_pointer_to_object = std::is_same::value; static_assert(has_pointer_to_object || std::is_same>::value, "" 0cc13bf012
