GasBuddy for Windows 8 is a utility to help you to find gas stations. The icon in your task bar shows you the gas prices at all the stations in the nearby area. You can also toggle between the map, the alphabetical list and the distance list. GasBuddy for Windows 8 A: Here is Google's own mobile app with which you can search for gas stations near by. in a functional way. In fact, it does not even return a value - I think it simply dumps out a somewhat useful error message. What about functions that take a while? Using the call() method, the function will not return until the process has finished. This is useful when, for example, the server takes some time to start up. However, if you have a simple function that takes a few seconds to run, call() is wasteful. Fortunately, there is a little-known method called spawn() that returns a thread. These threads are similar to threads in the sense that they operate independently and also can be killed. It is this fact that makes spawn() useful. An example of this is below. First, the server is started in a thread. This is called the reactor thread. Then, the function that takes a while is called. If the server does not return within 10 seconds, a deadlock exception is raised. If the server does not return, the reactor thread is also dead. This is because the reactor thread has died and the server cannot be killed. The remaining thread in the thread pool is then used to call the function. `def start(cmdline): out, err = subprocess.communicate(cmdline) if out: return out if err: raise Error("Server died unexpectedly: '%s'" % err) spawn(start, (start, cmdline))` The thread that was used to call the function is still in the thread pool and can then be used to call the function again. The only difference is that, because the function is being called from within a thread, it can run in a different thread and also cancel if it needs to. Another, perhaps more useful, feature of spawn() is that it supports killing the thread without causing a deadlock. This is done by calling the ExitProcess() method on the thread. To do this, the spawn() method is modified slightly. At the end of the spawned function, a call is made to Exit
