Download 1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to an apparatus for separating and collecting both good and bad non-disposable absorbent garments such as hospital underpants, and particularly to such an apparatus which permits the parts of good absorbent garments, e.g. hospital underpants, collected after use in a medical facility to be readily separated from those parts of bad absorbent garments, e.g. hospital underpants, collected from a patient after use and also permits the good absorbent garments to be readily collected and subjected to pathogenic inspection after use. 2. Description of the Prior Art Non-disposable absorbent garments, such as hospital underpants, have heretofore been collected at the end of each day and transported to a central reprocessing facility. There, the underpants are washed and sterilized, sometimes, after they have been inspected for pathogenic contamination. After they have been released from the reprocessing facility for use the next day, the underpants are collected and returned to the medical facility. In recent years, however, medical facilities have sought to reduce the cost of disposing of disposable absorbent garments. In order to reduce the amount of labor needed to separate the good absorbent garments, to reprocess the separated good absorbent garments, and then to collect the separated bad absorbent garments, medical facilities have sought to reduce the time used to collect the underpants. Accordingly, it would be desirable to separate the non-disposable absorbent garments when they are collected from a patient, rather than waiting until the end of the day. Medical facilities also have sought to improve upon the conventional underpants inspection and reprocessing procedures. Current procedures for checking for pathogenic contamination of underpants include conducting a visual examination, by trained nurses and technicians, of the underpants when they are picked up from a patient. This visual examination often is conducted using a device known as a "plunge tub," which is used to visually examine the underpants by immersing them fully or partially in a vessel filled with liquid. When the person carrying the underpants drops them into the vessel, the underpants expand and fill the vessel, completely surrounding the vessel with underpants. After a suitable period of immersion in the liquid, the underpants can be removed and the liquid poured out of the vessel, leaving the underpants drained. This allows the person carrying the underpants to visually examine the underpants by examining them without the overlying underpants

Indeed, digital video compression is a common technique for the interchange or storage of data, particularly where bandwidth is limited, such as on a wireless telephone network or on a cable television network. For example, MPEG-4 compression is used on the internet, many cable television providers use MPEG-2 compression, and digital VCRs use MPEG-1. Additionally, digital video compression techniques are used in many digital video devices, such as digital VCRs, DVD devices, camcorders, and personal video recorders. MPEG-4 was developed to standardize compression techniques. It uses correlation, quantization, and entropy coding for data compression. In the standard, video is divided into frames, each frame including a number of slices. There are three types of slices (intra, predicted, and bi-directional slices). All of the data in a frame are allocated to one slice. The intra-frames are coded without any reference to other frames. Predicted-frames are coded using predicted pictures. Predicted frames are coded in terms of differences between the current frame and a predicted frame. Bi-directional-frames are coded in terms of differences between a current frame and a predicted frame. For video compression, MPEG-4 uses wavelet and fractal transforms for intra and predicted frames.
