get_content.Q: Return an imported module using the time it takes the module to import I have an importlib.import_module where I need to check whether or not a function has been imported yet using time.time() to see if it has taken less than 1 second. The way I was doing it was doing importlib.import_module(function_to_import).time() > time.time(), but that doesn't work because it doesn't return a module. As a workaround, I use a try: except: stmt and instead of returning the module object itself, it returns None: try: importlib.import_module(function_to_import).time() > time.time() except (RuntimeError, NotImplementedError): # return None so that the else part isn't run else: # execute something, that was supposed to be executed only if the function was imported successfully Is there a way to return the imported module using the try: except: stmt or any other solution? A:

importlib.import_module returns a module object, so it can be used as normal after the import. import importlib import_module = importlib.import_module(module_or_object) # check it's a function first, then be careful with "del None" import_module() # will import. import_module(module_or_object()) will raise ImportError import_module.time() > time.time() # will return True

Looking for something good to read? I have managed to compile a list of my favourite books of all time. This is by no means a definitive list and is merely the compilation of my preferences. 3. Acquarellism - Claude Monet This was the first book I read and it was through this that I first became interested in art. 4. Jurassic Park – Michael Crichton This was the
