Fetal alcohol syndrome (FAS) is the most common known cause of mental retardation, affecting about one per 1000 births. The syndrome is characterized by growth retardation, neurodevelopmental impairment and facial dysmorphism. Among neurodevelopmental impairments, abnormal corpus callosum (ACC) volume and laterality are the most frequently encountered abnormalities. A number of ACC morphological abnormalities have been described in children with FAS, mostly in posterior regions of the corpus. Among features studied in FAS, ACC is the only brain structure that has been subjected to MRI and does not produce magnetic susceptibility artefacts, thus allowing an accurate visualization of its morphological details. Magnetic resonance imaging performed on FAS patients showed abnormalities in different regions of the ACC. Despite the lack of definite conclusions, these findings suggest that (a) macrostructural changes occur in different regions of the ACC in children with FAS; (b) these changes occur at different ages; and (c) these changes are not related with the severity of the alcohol exposure. The goal of the present review is to present the most significant findings in FAS and discuss their potential physiopathological significance, in order to provide a basis for a more accurate clinical evaluation and study of FAS. d0c515b9f4

CHR Presidential Spokesperson Theodore Tanguay told reporters that the CHR urged the government to "resolve this problem very quickly and resolve this situation right now." ADVERTISEMENT He said the CHR is "deeply concerned about reports of harassment, intimidation and threats" against Filipino artists in Beijing for criticizing what they said was China's human rights record. China has a long-running feud with the Philippines over territorial disputes in the South China Sea. In May, the CHR and the Philippines sought help from the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), the U.N.'s covenant on civil and political rights, after more than 100 Filipino activists were barred from leaving Beijing for the Asian Games. The activists were among a group of nearly 100 Filipino artists and writers who signed a petition, which was circulated on social media, denouncing China for its human rights record.
