If you search for a good editor for Linux, you will find that most of them have one or two annoying aspects. For example, the user interface is often confusing and clumsy and the default behavior of some programs is not good for use. So, it is very important for the users to consider the pros and cons of the editor and make a decision depending on the needs of each. Then, you can choose a good editor for Linux. In this post, we will go through some of the editors for Linux. For example, some of them are good in image editors, text editors, PHP editors, and others. Brief Introduction of Editors for Linux As you know, not only the developers but also the end users use these editors. It means that the editor which you use in Windows is not suitable for Linux. Because Linux is a different operating system and not a Windows. If you are using a Windows editor, you will be more flexible in Linux. For example, if you have a Windows editor, you can share your document with other people easily. At the same time, it is essential to know that Linux has more than 500,000 text editors. I know that this number is a little difficult to count, but even though the number is small, it is still a lot. So, you will be able to choose any text editor from the above numbers. Moreover, Linux has all types of editors. For example, image editors, text editors, PHP editors, and others. In order to choose an editor, you can go through the list below and choose an editor which you like the most. Image Editors for Linux Most editors for Linux are used for image editing. Because images are used to communicate a lot on the Internet. So, you can use a photo editor for any special occasion, or to create artwork for yourself. If you have an editor for Linux, you can use it to edit different images. Here, we will discuss some of the editors for Linux: GIMP GIMP is one of the most popular Linux image editors.

GIMP is a professional image editing program and it is open source. Since GIMP is easy to learn and has a lot of features, it has become popular among users in these days. If you need to use GIMP for Linux, you can download it from its official website or install from PPA (Personal Package Archive).
