"I just can't trust people anymore" - AgentSmith I'm a software engineer for 15 years now. I love to create software. A couple of years ago, I got into creating applications for Smartphones, tablets and wearables. At first, I wanted to get serious about it and create apps that would go real-time, real-world and decentralised. Of course, I started to realise how difficult and difficult it could be. Especially for an independent developer. I wanted to release my apps and make some money from it, so I spent almost a full year testing it, creating a budget and practically begging people for money. I realised that there is no point to have good technology if you don't plan to sell it to people. In the meantime, I have been maintaining an open source project, run a startup and released a couple of open source apps. I have learned that the only way I can monetise my work is by creating apps that people will pay for. I don't want to make apps for the sake of making apps or to create a portfolio for myself. I want to create apps that people would actually want and pay for. It's been 7 months now that I have no social life and

How do you trust strangers to do work online? That's one of the questions security experts at the University of Cincinnati are trying to figure out. Nearly two-thirds of consumers are concerned about privacy and security issues related to the use of smartphones, a new study found. The results are outlined in the 2016 U.S. Consumer Policy Radar. The report was released by the University of Cincinnati's Food, Nutrition, and Behavioral Economics lab. According to the report, a growing number of Americans are tuning out the social media and search giant, Google. Out of the 1,501 adults in the U.S. surveyed, 65% said they think that online or smartphone use could lead to misunderstandings about a person's self-identity. "The implications of the survey are alarming. As we deepen our understanding of how privacy is changing, we will need to make adjustments to ensure that we are protecting Americans in the most effective way possible," the report's author, Christina Greer, says. "We have set up a website to get members of the public into the lab where we can get their input on the most pressing issues we are encountering in this area. "As a nation, we cannot allow use of the Internet to lead to increased mistrust of each other," she says. A growing number of Americans are saying they
