In a recent study from Japan, associations between traumatic experiences, PTSD, depression, and general health in MS were identified in a total sample of 522 MS patients, while no differences in these dimensions were observed between patients and matched controls \[[@CR45]\]. In line with these observations, we found no difference in self-reported disease duration between patients with depression and patients without depression. It is important to note that there was no difference in depression and PTSD symptoms between the patients and controls, which could be a result of the measurement instrument. However, studies that have used identical questionnaires have reported moderate to high prevalence rates of depression and PTSD in MS patients \[[@CR1],[@CR2],[@CR18]\]. It is plausible that these high rates are also true for our patients, although we cannot exclude the possibility that a difference in depression and/or PTSD symptom
