KIEV (Reuters) - Ukraine's government said on Thursday it was pulling out of peace talks over its conflict with pro-Russian separatists in the eastern Donbass region after separatists shot down a military plane, killing all 49 people on board. Ukrainian President Petro Poroshenko and Russian President Vladimir Putin are due to meet in the Black Sea resort city of Sochi on Thursday and Friday at talks that are likely to be tense, given the loss of life in the rebel ambush. A Ukrainian official said the army could take over peace talks if the rebels continued to show hostility, after they seized the body of one of the soldiers in Friday's shooting, a boost to separatists in their campaign for more autonomy. The talks, expected to be held in Geneva, are due to take place on Saturday in an effort to find a solution to the conflict, which has gone on for more than five years and has killed more than 10,000 people, according to United Nations data. "As of today it is impossible to see the possibility of the official continuation of the peace talks," Prime Minister Volodymyr Groysman said at a meeting of the security council. "If the side, which wants to continue the talks, continues the provocation of terrorists, then it won't allow to hold the talks as it will not be possible to sort out a crisis of this size." In a statement, Russia said the talks would be held, adding that Kiev and Moscow could meet face-to-face in person in Moscow. What's new in NEW SCUFFED STARTER PACK:

| "White Gold" In "White Gold," the mood of Moses's father works in his son's behalf. "White Gold" is a soulful blare of sensuality that comes from the horns of a bull that grunts, challenges and expects to have one more tail before being taken home. Miles Davis is most connoisseurs agree the most important trumpeter since Charlie Parker, but was he not too down in the gutter to swing? Surely not. Fifteen years ago, one of Johnny Crawford's tributes was titled, "Miles isn't what you think he is." Be that as it may, the political side of Davis was predisposed to the artist prior to him moving from bebop to fusion. "And Freddie, too. And, of course, Charlie Parker, and, I have to say, Chet Baker, Miles too." As a reedist, Davis was a maverick in a time of lambasted reedists, his tone parts, the trombone and trumpet wading around on the front lines of the bebop revolution. Beyond bebop, he was a personal feel of the music and he created a great sound by tapping into his sensual side. "Miles was more of a lyrical thinker," stated famous saxophonist Bud Powell. "Miles was a very sentimental type man." Most considered that he addressed himself to the juncture of discord and tranquility, the pernicious dichotomy between good and evil. "He wasn't on the right track," said Al Foster, who often played with Davis. "Miles was very eclectic. You don't go to work every morning saying, 'I'm going to play Western swing.' Your approach to a song is spontaneous. Miles was spontaneous to a fault sometimes and he was now and then ahead of his time." "White Gold" is a piece from Davis' first post-bop album on Columbia released in 1963. It is 42 seconds plus 30 seconds of reprise. It is mercurial; jaunty yet tangy, complex yet simple; melodic yet edgy, lecherous yet alluring and, most importantly, a piece most anti-narcotics.
