When I take the latitude and longitude from the business, calculate the distance between the business and I, and then take the distance and convert it to feet I am getting very large numbers. I assume this is due to the difference in distance units. For example I take the latitude and longitude of a business from here, then enter the latitude and longitude to Google maps and the distance between the two is 2,560 How does Google Maps API handle roundtrip distance conversions? A: While in general Google uses the WGS84 datum to convert between map coordinates and latitude and longitude, the historical reason they have been using Decimal degrees is because of a quirk in longitude. Google uses the meridian of the the original degrees. As such, you are using the distance in Decimal degrees (as opposed to radians), but Google is using radians to calculate the distance. To get around this, Google decided
