Use of an ultrasound scanner with a helical scan platform for the assessment of internal carotid artery stenosis: comparison of grayscale, Doppler and power Doppler imaging. The purpose of this study was to assess the diagnostic accuracy of an ultrasound scanner with a helical scan platform in the evaluation of carotid artery stenosis. We compared the accuracy of grayscale, color Doppler and power Doppler imaging in detecting significant (degree > or =70%) carotid artery stenosis with the results of digital subtraction angiography (DSA). The study included 135 asymptomatic patients who underwent both DSA and ultrasound examination. DSA was used as the standard reference and the sensitivity and specificity of the three ultrasound methods in detecting a stenosis of 50% and greater were compared. The overall sensitivity of grayscale, color Doppler and power Doppler for the detection of a stenosis of 50% or greater were 57%, 74% and 84%, respectively. The respective specificity for these methods were 75%, 89% and 78%. The use of sonography for the detection of significant internal carotid artery stenosis can be considered as a reliable technique in the diagnosis of carotid artery stenosis when compared with the reference method DSA. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a hologram recording medium, a hologram recording and reproducing apparatus, a hologram recording and reproducing method, and a program and, more particularly, to a hologram recording medium suitable for recording holograms using a light beam of a high light intensity, a hologram recording and reproducing apparatus, a hologram recording and reproducing method, and a program. 2. Description of the Related Art Conventionally, a hologram is recorded as an interference pattern, and a reproducing light beam (object beam) is projected so as to intersect with the recording medium (hologram recording medium). At this time, the hologram can be reproduced by utilizing the interference of the object beam and the reproducing light beam reflected in the recording medium and transmitted therefrom and passes the recording medium. However, when the object beam is a light beam of high light intensity, the object beam and the reproducing beam are not received by the photodetecting element because of damages or destruction of the hologram recording medium. For example, a hologram is recorded in a recording medium of a polycarbonate type sheet using a
