What's new:

Content on this page comes directly from press releases and fact sheets provided by publishers and developers and was not written by the Game Revolution staff.Portable computing devices, such as notebook personal computers (PC), have lost significant market share to tablet personal computers (PC) for a variety of reasons. For example, notebook PCs, which are characterized by small display areas, often may be too small for comfortable use while viewing screens, they are typically too large to be reasonably transported while still being portable, and their keyboards are known to be uncomfortable to type on. Similarly, tablet PCs are capable of providing displays that are larger than those of typical notebook PCs, but they may have keyboards that are generally bulky compared with the flat and miniaturized shape of a typical notebook PC's keyboards and they are typically physically clumsy when it is desired to type on them. In order to achieve portability, an increasing number of laptop designs have made the displays significantly smaller than the keyboard (e.g., folding designs, with the keyboard underneath the display that partially or completely reduces the size of the keyboard and the keyboard, and difficult to type on). At the same time, existing laptop designs provide attachable tablets having displays, which can be adjusted (e.g., rotated, folded) to an attachable keyboard. These attachable tablets, however, generally need to be docked in order to provide sufficient display real estate, they lack the ability to be carried easily and independently, and they may be only usable by attaching the tablet to a dock or having the device positioned in a tablet cradle (e.g., for charging). In particular, when a notebook PC or a tablet PC is docked and inserted into a docking station, the notebook PC (or tablet PC) may inhibit or prevent normal operation of the docking station by draining all of the power from the docking station, preventing charging of the notebook PC (or tablet PC) until its batteries are recharged, or otherwise preventing charging or reducing the life of the batteries of the notebook PC (or tablet PC). For example, by drawing power from the docking station and/or the battery, a notebook PC or tablet PC may require an unacceptably long time to charge. Further, the USB (Universal Serial Bus) connectors of notebook PCs and docking stations may inhibit compatibility between different types of notebooks PCs and docking stations, as the USB connector may be fundamentally incompatible with some characteristics of the docking station's power supply. Further, a notebook PC may not be fully charged when it is docked.
