The bird that sheds the feathers is usually a young one, and the feathers are usually kept inside the feather follicle. When the feathers are moulted, the old feathers are blown away in a thick cloud by a strong wind. The term "feather", as applied to humans, refers to hair or wool that is made of many individual hairs of the same type. Feathers enhance the effect of cosmetics. For example, feathers can add a luxurious touch to the skin to make skin care products more efficient. The effects of feathers depend on the material. Feathers with strong organic fibers absorb the light more than synthetic fibers. The use of feathers in ornamentation has evolved over time. In India, it is the women of the Toda tribe who are skilled in this art, resulting in elaborate headdresses. There are three traditional methods of wearing feathers. The first is the patchwork method, where the feathers are glued together to make a pattern. The second is the tassel method, in which the feathers
