Take a look at a bird's-eye view of the Northern Mariana Islands, part of the U.S. Commonwealth. Northern Mariana Islands Photo The Japanese government is set to compensate the descendants of its wartime sex slaves with about $6 million in cash, four years after it apologized for forcing local girls into sex slavery. One girl, called "Otaru" or "Eternal Spring" was given about $1.2 million. Another, called "Yoshida" was given $2.6 million, according to a list of the money distributed to descendants. The amounts reflect the value of the property the Japanese government took from them, in addition to their financial losses, according to Tadashi Muto, a lawyer representing the government. The announcement is a significant step toward resolving a case that has caused outrage in the islands and cost the Japanese government billions of dollars in legal fees and compensation. It comes nearly seven years after Tokyo's prime minister apologized to the victims and their families in exchange for an agreement from their lawyers for a relatively small amount of compensation. The compensation amount reflects the value of all property and assets that Tokyo took from the former residents, said Mark Takasugi, a lawyer for the women. The cases involving at least 350 former residents were settled in 2015, but lawyers for the women have dragged out the process of negotiating a settlement. New Tokyo Governor The cash distribution has come just days before the International Red Cross is set to visit the islands for the second time to assess the mental health of former residents and gauge their needs. The trip is an opportunity for the 300,000 people who now live on the islands to speak with the Red Cross about their experiences during the war. "We didn't ask to come here," said Eri Takamori, who was born a few
