Q: how to run a script every 10 seconds using cron I have a script on a Windows 10 Linux server. I am trying to run the script every 10 seconds using cron using the command `~/srv/scripts/cron.sh` but it doesnt seem to work. A: Try `grep -cE "your.pattern" /some/directory/` A: On UNIX-based systems the most widely used way to run a command (in C language) every N minutes is by using this crontab entry: `/10 * * * *` command `arg1 arg2 arg3` If your script will generate a lot of data (or all of it is textual one), but if you have almost no time requirement, you can add this to the script to avoid filling your `/tmp` directory with your data: `# Temporarily save your output to /tmp/output.txt to avoid filling up your # hard disk with temporary files. files=`ls -l /some/directory 2>&1 | grep -v "some_device_access_log_|_log_" > /tmp/output.txt` # The actual stuff above goes here # Restore original settings (put your temporary file back in place): for file in ${files}; do rm -f /tmp/output.txt done` This way you can save your temporary data only after you finished the script. A: `cronjob.sh: while true; do echo "foo"; sleep 10; done` or using single line batch command: `@echo off :loop echo foo ping -n 1 localhost >nul goto :loop`
