The young lawyer had been walking up and down the room, and now paused by an open window, on which the moon was shining, and casting a broad light upon the city. The feeble shriek of a distant child awoke the echoes; some belated passenger, in going by, glanced at the window, saw the mysterious figure, and turning from his way, passed along with hurried steps. The window was partly open, and there was a delicious freshness in the soft breeze which came in. The young lawyer looked out into the country, and then turned to the house door. "I must see that unhappy man," he said in a low but decided tone; "I must speak with him, even if it is in his prison cell. I won't be satisfied, until I have seen him." "My lord, Sir Philip is very old, and in failing health; his mind is unsettled, and the doctors say that he is so enfeebled that he may live but a week; but if you wish, you may see him, and I will take you to the cell door." So saying, he led the lawyer through the house, and thence up the stone steps to the open entrance of the prison house. The two gentlemen looked through the iron door, saw the jailor with the keys, and were admitted to the solitary room, in which the prisoner was confined. "He looks very well, Sir Philip," said the young lawyer. "I do not see that he is changed." "No, indeed," replied Sir Philip, "he is not changed; he is
