Q: How does OCaml's polymorphic records define their read interface for newtype values? OCaml's newtype value can be written to and read from by passing a function to the read constructor: `type ('a, 'b, 'c) t = { mutable v : int -> 'a } let v = { read_v = fun x -> x }` The read interface specifies that the function passed into the constructor will have an extra argument which is the current value of the record. Normally, I would expect `v` to have type `int -> 'a -> 'a`, but OCaml seems to define it to have type `int -> 'b -> 'a`. I'm looking for a detailed explanation of how this is defined, because I'm trying to understand what the semantics of the runtime library are. I think that it's possible to write code that encounters the above constructor and tries to work out how the polymorphic value `t` maps to the concrete value type `'a, 'b, 'c`, but from my experience this can be tricky. Why does `v` have type `int -> 'b -> 'a`, and not just `int -> 'a`? What guarantees does the runtime library provide that `v` is polymorphic enough to get the correct `'b` for the runtime type of `t`? A: OCaml does not give types to your records directly. If you look at the definition of `v`

Georges-Pierre Seurat Georges-Pierre Seurat, who signed himself as Seurat, was a French painter of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. He is regarded as one of the most influential and important figures in modern painting, and was an innovator and early practitioner of impressionism. Early career Seurat was born in Paris to a poor family of wine merchants. He first studied art in the studio of Felix Gaboriau. In the summer of 1886, he showed for the first time his paintings at the Salon des Artistes-peintres in Goupil & Cie., attracting little attention from the Salon jury. His early works were full of the harshness of the Academic style. His first Monstro (Monster, 1886), a depiction of an octopus with eight arms crawling out of a trunk, was shown at a local exhibition. He painted sea creatures obsessively in the ensuing years, usually in semi-abstract modes of varying detail and color, and he was influenced by the work of Franz von Bayros, a professor of botany at the University of Königsberg. He visited Bayros's Königsberg laboratory in the summer of 1890. Berthe Morisot He met the Impressionist painter Berthe Morisot at
