Alkylation is a reaction in which an alkyl group is added to an organic molecule. In this method of functionalization, an alkyl group derived from a lower alkane is coupled with an organic molecule containing a reactive hydrogen, such as an alcohol, a phenol, a carboxylic acid, or an amine. For example, the conjugation of propylene to an alcohol forms a condensation reaction product that is called butyl rubber. Butyl rubber is a synthetic elastomer used in various applications because of its physical properties. Butyl rubber has also been used as a raw material for a number of other compounds, such as plastics and adhesives. Lithium-induced serotonergic and dopaminergic activation in the dorsal and ventral striatum. Lithium is the most effective pharmacological treatment for bipolar disorders, but its mechanism of action is still unclear. We studied the effect of acute lithium treatment on serotonergic and dopaminergic function, using in vivo $[^{11}\text{C}]\text{-}(+)\text{McN-5652/5-HTP}$ and $[^{11}\text{C}]\text{NPA PET}$, respectively. Tryptophan/dopamine and tryptophan/serotonin transporters were imaged in the dorsal and ventral striatum. The binding potential (BPND) of both ligands significantly decreased by 30% in the dorsal striatum. BPND values of tryptophan/dopamine and tryptophan/serotonin transporters in the ventral striatum were not changed by lithium. An activation of the noradrenergic system in the dorsal striatum was observed. Serotonin transporter binding potential of the dorsal striatum was decreased on the ipsilateral side of treatment. The present data add to a previous study from our group that showed lithium-induced dopaminergic activation in the prefrontal cortex. They suggest a topographic co-localization of lithium's effects on serotonergic and dopaminergic transmission. Both processes are involved in the response to lithium treatment that seems to be comparable in different brain regions. 4%, respectively. The mean age of the patients was 63
