Applied as a tablet supplement, hand hygiene practice means using the antimicrobial hand wash from the bottle with hands exposed to the environment for direct contact with the skin. It helps prevent the transfer of microorganisms from one human being to another. For this reason, healthcare institutions such as hospitals are advised to follow proper hygiene while performing routine activities. This practice is vital in keeping the hospital clean and safe. Both the nursing staff and their patients are highly exposed to the hospital environment and their hands are usually the gateway through which bacteria from patients touch the healthcare providers. Using hand hygiene practice is highly important to prevent the transmission of pathogens that cause disease. Many studies carried out in the past have established that hand hygiene practice is an effective way of preventing the transmission of pathogens. The World Health Organization (WHO) had first introduced recommendations regarding proper hand hygiene practice in 2000.[@ref1] These WHO recommendations were later updated and released in 2005.[@ref2] The updated version of these recommendations were released in 2016 to standardize the hand hygiene practice.[@ref3] There are many barriers for proper hand hygiene practice in the health care setting. Since many healthcare workers are not aware of proper hand hygiene practice, they do not follow these guidelines. The procedures for hand hygiene practice differ across healthcare institutions. For example, there are no regulations or instructions from the health authorities on what the healthcare workers should wear on their hands
