What's new in Tightrope Walking:

(this article is part of a series on tightrope walking. For the complete list of links and previous articles, click here) In the first episode of the BBC show Life of Brian, Eric Idle plays a character called Joe Strummer who is a passionate exponent of Judeo-Christianity and a hero to his fellow Britons. The other characters, including Simon Jones as his best friend Terry (referred to by many as a favour from the Lord to fit the parody), are progressive atheists and consummate revolutionists. I am mostly an atheist, but sometimes the spiritual tradition of Christianity retains a lot of appeal to me. I was thinking about this the other day when I was attending a school assembly, and I was pleased that the teacher read this verse from the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON): One should regard All Religions as merely different paths to the same ultimate destination. They recommend this verse: Victory to Mother, Victory to Krishna. Victory to Mother, Victory to Krishna. Mother, whiter than the mountains, whiter than the clouds, In Her eyes shineth the effulgence of Krishna's eternal abode of well-being. Victory to Krishna. Victory to Mother. Victory to Krishna. Victory to Mother. Victory to Krishna. Victory to God. In a story that originated with William Shakespeare, Macbeth tells how incantations and charms can be effective to manipulate others: But in our actual experiences, people often turn out exactly how they started out. Gandhi's attempt at self-sobriety did not last. The Nazi leader Adolf Hitler started out as an Austrian clown. The warlordlord Joséph Stalin thought that the world didn't need any more wars. And Willy Brandt was the unofficial leader of the liberal-socialist political party, but ended up being a moderate liar who ended up running a horrible government. Although I mostly agree with Emily Dickinson, I disagree with what she said in the actual poem that she wrote. She said that God is most creative when He is most like the Devil. If you read A Selection, you can see for yourself that it is largely about the hermetic art of producing art out of nothing. Part of his dictionary project is to look up a word and say "I am
