I'm working with the wxWidgets library. Someone told me to use the application event loop but I am not 100% sure about it. A: Here's one way I do it. It may be grossly inefficient if you are doing many checks of login status throughout your application. The way I do it is by setting and clearing a flag from within the event loop. When you load your wxWidgets application you create an event loop, which in wxWidgets generally refers to an object that keeps track of events and tries to process them in the order they occur. In this case the event loop is the wxApp object that represents your entire application. The event loop is created as you would create any other type of object: wxApp * myApp = new wxApp(); Now you can add events to the event loop such as wxIDLE_TIMEOUT events: wxApp::Connect(wxIDLE_TIMEOUT, (wxAppEventFunction)&doSomething); When your application has finished processing the events it will call the DoLoop function: void DoLoop() { while(1) { // process the events that have occurred since // the last time we called DoLoop int len = MY_FUNCTION

Later.On what is called the last day of the year, 2018, the year that has proved its worth by its great development as much as by its wars, and that has shown its merits and its ruins, a great revolution will take place among human knowledge; all the sciences and arts, all the religions and all the metaphysics will be overturned. Of all truths, those will remain that will be supported by the most solid facts, which however, are not all; neither everything, nor all humans have the same weight; the weight of things depends on each of us as much as on others. Yet, I have made some very modest calculations which make it probable that about 1/4 of what we still think we know, will be a lie; the other 3/4 will not be true at all. The truth would then be divided into those that serve mankind, and those that do not serve. That would do harm to the causes that have found the most success over the last 100 years, but the perils of knowing something false would prevent mankind from going to the end of truth, to know everything that can be known. There are some who would not even be able to understand these words: I have only contemplated what I call their second nature. On the last day of the year, they will be unable to understand that they have been wasting their time, for the knowledge of an infinite number of things will be useless to them.
