In the field of fluorescence measurements it is known to determine the concentration of a chemical species or agent in a body of fluid by measuring the optical output of an optically excited fluorescing agent. See, for example, U.S. Pat. Nos. 3,725,591 and 3,894,482, and "Fluorescence of One- and Two-Dimensional Semiconductor Structures", J. Opt. Soc. Am. 11, 1479 (1984). In the past, the optical output produced by optically exciting a fluorescing agent has been detected by positioning a camera on the surface of a relatively thick layer of fluid, such as a glass vial containing a bulk solution or suspension of a fluorescing agent. A disadvantage of such a process is that the fluorescence quenching effects associated with the direct contact of the camera with the surface of the fluid can lead to a significant reduction of the useful signal. In the past, the more recent technology, disclosed for example in U.S. Pat. Nos. 3,702,294 and 3,743,655, has used a light integrating device positioned on the surface of a bulk solution or suspension of a fluorescing agent. The response of such devices has been limited, however, because the total quantity of the fluorescing agent in the bulk solution or suspension is significantly less than the amount which can be optically excited in the bulk solution or suspension. The quantity of the fluorescing agent that can be optically excited is determined by the optical transmission or excitation of the bulk solution or suspension. In view of the fact that there is always a limited quantity of the fluorescing agent optically excitable in the bulk solution or suspension, the measuring accuracy is an important factor in the design of the integrating device. The measuring accuracy, as well as the response time of the measuring instrument, can be improved by employing a high optical transmission rate sheet in the optical excitation path e79caf774b

3.5 Free Full Version | VPC 2007. Comparison of myocardial tissue-bound and circulating levels of thioredoxin, catalase and glutathione peroxidase in patients with hypertension and coronary artery disease. Myocardial reactive oxygen species and antioxidants in the diseased myocardium have been implicated in the pathogenesis of cardiovascular disease.
However, it is unclear whether tissue levels of antioxidant enzymes are altered in patients with hypertension and coronary artery disease. The aim of the present study was to compare myocardial tissue-bound and circulating levels of thioredoxin (TRX), catalase (CAT) and glutathione peroxidase (GPX) in patients with hypertensive or coronary artery disease. Twenty-five patients with uncomplicated essential hypertension, 14 patients with hypertension and coronary artery disease and 15 control subjects participated. Left ventricular myocardial biopsies were performed for determination of tissue CAT, GPX and TRX levels. Venous blood samples were taken and the circulating levels of GPX, CAT and TRX were determined by spectrophotometry. The tissue concentration of antioxidant enzymes in the myocardium was higher in patients with hypertension or coronary artery disease than in control subjects (P
