If the state's economic trajectory continues down the current path, economic stress will become an even more urgent issue for leaders and voters, and the state's political future will be perilous. And yet, despite the grim backdrop, there are glimmers of hope in an issue that has been key to the success of Governor Jerry Brown's first term -- climate change. The governor's new declaration has three purposes: First, the world must act on climate change to stop the earth's average temperature rise from surpassing 2 degrees Celsius above pre-industrial levels. Next, the United States and China need to work with other countries to cut carbon emissions. And lastly, California must lead the way in the world's pursuit of new technologies for clean energy. The Declaration sets out this agenda on seven pillars. The pillars are as follows: * The world must set a course for zero emissions. * California and the world must take action together to cut emissions. * California must lead the world in new clean energy technologies. * California must forge new partnerships. * California must do everything it can to stay in the middle of the main stream in the global fight against climate change. * California's e79caf774b
