Converting videos to GIFs To make videos suitable for web use, you need to use GIMP, which you can download for free from the GIMP website. Choose this program because it is quite versatile and can do all the basic editing tasks you will need to make videos look great for web use. Open the video you want to convert. Click the "Video" dropdown menu and choose "GIF Animation." Close the option dialog box. You should see your video in the Canvas area. If you do not, drag the video into the Canvas. Click the "Frame" drop-down menu at the top of the Canvas. Choose "Make frames." The Frames layer appears. Select the frames you want to convert by clicking and then dragging the frame marker to the desired frame number. The Frames layer does not have to be selected, but the marker will not move unless the layer is selected. Go to Edit > Transform > Reset. You should see a number of different icons with white on the inside and black on the outside. Each type of icon represents a different feature, such as fill, stroke, and so on. Change the fill option to "Black White." Select the frames you want to use on the Frames layer. Click and drag the frames into the sequence you created on the Frames layer. The Frames layer will now display your animation. Go to the Animation menu and choose "Make Frames." Go to the Animation menu and choose "Subtitle." Click on the New Subtitle entry. A dialog box will pop up with options for your subtitle. You can edit and add frames as needed for your subtitle. Click Next to continue. Note: There is a current version of GIMP that has a bug where the underlying GIF files that are created can not be opened with a different program without being converted to JPEG first. The bug was fixed in version 2.8, so this is only a problem if you are currently running a later version of GIMP. Newly introduced anti-smoking regulation may leave many smokers feeling trapped in their homes, unable to go out at all, and its forecast for more 90,000 smokers to die from the new rule would make the anti-smoker lobby look more like a tobacco-control cheerleading squad. The Food and Drug Administration estimates that 86 percent of Americans have already begun smoking by the time they're 6 years old, and now the agency has been given the power to regulate tobacco products in the same manner as alcoholic beverages, and is busy creating its own nicotine delivery system. The FDA's new "deeming rule" will completely change the way most tobacco products are sold, and the majority of Americans likely will not like what they find, according to industry sources. "The idea that even your local corner bar could be raided by the FDA is absurd," a source told Politico. "I mean, literally, what will the FDA do once they get their hands on a pack of cigarettes? Demand that you put one in your mouth and light it?" The rule will force tobacco companies to print on their packs a list of ingredients, including chemicals such as ammonia and formaldehyde, and it would also help fund a new national campaign, "designed to raise awareness about tobacco companies' deadly products." A law firm representing the industry claims that some of the tobacco-control measures could easily be implemented by a local bar owner, and "anyone who tries to smoke in their store could be arrested," and that "even a single, simple item on the menu — such as grilled cheese — could run afoul of the rule." "The truth is, the government could shut down all forms of retail smoking at any time — cigarette sellers, cigar shops, bars and sports arenas — overnight and the public would likely have no idea," the source said, arguing that they are not wronging Americans. "For decades, the government has been violating the First Amendment by keeping tax-payers from saying 'no' to tobacco advertisements." They told Politico, "It's a bad idea. It's a horribly bad idea." Current FDA regulations focus on advertising, and bar owners say a new rule will mean they will have to remove cigarette packages from their cash registers, adding that "the rule also is not based on
