Google is trying to become the world's first trillion dollar company. With that in mind, if you want to make sure that Google Finance and its APIs do not become obsolete, you might want to follow this case of international law. In an attempt to become the world's first trillion dollar company, American multinational technology giant Google is calling on the EU to block specific Google Finance product APIs that would harm the interests of other companies. In the middle of June this year, the US company, which is responsible for Google Search and Google Chrome (for instance), filed a formal notice of objection with the EU Commission against two specific APIs, including the ECAPAPI. ECAPAPI defined the API's role is to provide an automated interface for exchanging the information between Google (searcher and Chrome) and financial markets. ECAPAPI defined the API's role is to provide an automated interface for exchanging the information between Google (searcher and Chrome) and financial markets. Google is also asking the EU for a deadline of 15 days for initiating action against the APIs - after which the company may resort to taking direct action. While Google clearly stated that it is not asking for the APIs to be dropped in their entirety, the US company is most concerned about users and financial investors being harmed by unauthorized access to the API. Google is also concerned that the on-going revelations of spying on user searches and Chrome tabs are definitely negatively affecting European citizens' right to privacy. Furthermore, the company argues that API's direct access without user consent are an unfair competitive advantage, since they enable full access to the API by potential outside parties. Google has sent notice against the APIs to the European Commission, after which the EU could take action. Google has notified the European Commission, indicating that the company plans to take action against the EU's official API to Google Finance, ECAPAPI, and Google News, GNNAPI, should they be put into operation. Through an application programming interface (API), it is possible to link a computer application to a website, or even to another API. The result is that an API can allow an app program to interact with another system without itself having to provide any user-interface to the user. The ECAPAPI, GNNAPI are specific versions of this. The launch of ECAPAPI and GNNAPI would directly harm other companies, including Google Search and Chrome.
