Cognitive impairment in bipolar affective disorder: a neuropsychological study. Bipolar affective disorder can be considered an illness involving mood and cognitive processes, and thus considerable evidence supports the hypothesis that such patients display a mild to moderate neuropsychological dysfunction. Moreover, the spectrum of cognitive deficits observed in bipolar affective disorder most often involves working memory and executive functions, with other cognitive functions showing moderate or lesser impairment. Recent studies, however, have demonstrated a wide range of neuropsychological dysfunctions, more specifically a reduction of speed and executive functions, together with greater efficiency of the fronto-striatal system in working memory. Because a better understanding of the cognitive profile of bipolar affective disorder is fundamental in the development of appropriate therapeutic strategies, this review presents a neuropsychological study of the cognitive impairments in bipolar affective disorder.Q: Collaborative visualization of HTML and JavaScript I would like to do a project for my school with a group of others which includes a visualization.
